Until 1860, the former was made up of a few thousand components, the second, of only a few hundred. This dual model was taken up again by the Kingdom of Italy, and for a few decades the number of carabinieri was five times greater than that of the Guardians of Public Safety (police). The enormous numerical imbalance between the two bodies began to diminish during the first two decades of the twentieth century and completely disappeared during the 1960s. For the fifteen successive years, these two groups maintained similar dimensions. During the last decade, however, the quantitative weight of the carabinieri has always been slightly greater than that of the state police, only because the former has a few more auxiliary members (who do not, however, perform other operative functions) than the latter.

It is more difficult to say, based on the data available to us, if and to what degree the territorial distribution of the police forces may have changed during the long period under consideration. We know that, immediately after the formation of a unified Italy, some regulations gave the carabinieri responsibility for policing the countryside, while the guardians of public safety policed the cities. In 1919, it was established by law that the Public Security Police would be responsible for 'police functions that [are] preventive, repressive, and related to maintaining public order in the larger population centers, leaving the supervision of the remaining territory of the State to the Royal Carabinieri'.² The basis of this regulation was the idea that, for three different reasons, the carabinieri were 'ill-adapted' to operate in urban centers where 'cunning, rather than violence, is the instrument of crime'
